

Globalisation

- There was a time when most regions were economically self-sufficient. Locally produced foods, fuels and raw materials were generally processed for local consumption. Trade between different regions was quite limited.
- Today, the economies of most countries are so interconnected that they form part of a single, interdependent global economy.

